Digital, Marketing & Technology Search

The Problem

Digital, Marketing and Technology companies face many recruitment problems when finding and retaining the 'A' players for their management teams and then those all so important delivery functions: Product Management, Marketing & Sales, Project Management & Senior Account Management, UX/ UI & Content Management, Web Development.

The standard approach that agencies and internal recruitment functions usually take is to post adverts on job boards and send blanket in-mails on LinkedIn.

The historical/ traditional methods include:

Job boards will give you access to candidates that are constantly looking for jobs because they typically don't have the skill sets that you'll be looking for.

Internal recruitment function: Internal recruiters are not mapping the entire market. They are typically NOT able to connect, engage and then constantly nurture candidates with super skill sets.

Local recruitment agencies: Tend to use communal databases that are being flogged by every consultant so that the rarer candidates, that YOU want, are typically being bombarded by email campaigns every time a new role becomes available that they are vaguely suitable for.

The Impact to you:

This process is slow and you'll typically only get access to the 10% of the quality in the market who are actively looking and difficult to place. The approach also tends to annoy the candidates and can damage your brand.

You'll not have a true insight into the digital, marketing & technology talent pool. Thereby forced to make an uninformed hiring decision possibly leading to having the wrong resource in place from which to operate and service your clients.

Not having the skill sets in place could prove disastrous when pitching for new work

Top 3 Hiring Challenges for UK Digital Agencies & Tech Companies.

Cutting through the noise: You want and need to attract the Top 15% but there's a lot of self-hype from candidates who want to secure the prestigious appointments but don't have the skills. You need the talent who have demonstrable experience in working with global b2b/b2c brands in a fast-paced client or agency background but the PSL is only supplying a limited number of qualified and suitable candidates (generally those who are on Job boards or who are in the current database). This means you only have access to those who are on the open job market, who probably don't have the skill-sets you require to properly service the client. This is sure to affect the overall client team performance, impact on the profitability and jeopardise securing future business.

Wasted Time: You waste time reviewing CV's and interviewing candidates, because you are sent lots of unsuitable CV's by agencies who either don't have a robust vetting system built from years of experience in the industry or because they don't understand the increasing specific demands of your clients. This will increase the time you spend on recruiting and perhaps the expense in securing the quality of candidate.

3.

Speed: The PSL, for whatever reason, can take too long to provide the necessary quality of appropriate marketing talent. This leads to your vacancies being open and on the market for far too long. This inherently causes gaps in your team's ability to service your clients and promotes a poor perception of the role/ business in the market.
